Moreover, a strong grasp of grammar facilitates the interpretation of new words encountered in various contexts, thereby aiding in vocabulary acquisition through reading, writing, and communication. In essence, proficiency in grammar is essential for broadening one's vocabulary and achieving fluency in a language. The power of expansion in vocabulary is undeniable, offering individuals the tools to communicate more effectively, comprehend complex ideas, and engage with the world on a deeper level. By continually broadening one's lexicon, individuals not only improve their linguistic abilities but also enhance their cognitive skills, leading to richer expression, deeper understanding, and more meaningful interactions. Introduction: By the middle of the seventeenth century English Language had more or less assumed its present form so far as grammar, spelling and pronunciation are concerned. From the Restoration onwards the chief developments have been in the direction of an enlargement of the vocabulary on the one hand and changes in the meaning of words on the other. As knowledge grows, so language grows with it. The English language is the richest of all the languages and has the most extensive vocabulary. Grammar considers words in terms of their part of speech, how they change forms, and the order in which they should be placed into sentences. Vocabulary considers words in terms of their meaning. Grammar is more nuanced and arguably more challenging to learn. Vocabulary is more straightforward, requiring that one memorize the meanings of words. Grammar is based on standard rules that remain relatively unchanged over time. However, the vocabulary of a language or an individual evolves as words fall out of usage and new terms are continuously created and learned. Grammar can best be applied by following a style guide or grammar book. Vocabulary can best be put to use by following a dictionary. Also, the word usage guidelines in style guides and most grammar books can help us use the right vocabulary word for the right context. We often get confused about the meaning of words if they're homophones.

Homophones sound alike but differ in meaning (and usually spelling too). For example, pair and pear are homophones. Usage guidelines, which focus on homophone and other pairs of confusing words, help us differentiate between words' meanings. There are so many aspects to focus on when learning a new language.

Language is a means of forming & storing ideas as reflection of reality & exchanging them into process of human intercourse. Language is social by nature. It is connected with people, who create & use it. It develops with the development of society. Language includes 3 parts: Formological system – determines the phonetical appearance of the significant unites. Lexical system – is a number of words & word groups. Grammatical system – is a number of rules, determining the combination of naming means in the formation of utterance as the embodiment of thinking process. Each of these parts is studied by a particular linguistic discipline is carried out by morphology, by lexicology, by grammar. Any linguistic description may have practical & theoretical parts. Practical description provides with a manual of practical mastery of the corresponding part of language. Practical linguistic manuals comprise all the types of description: Formological, lexical, grammatical. As for the theoretical linguistic descriptions, they usually pursue analytical aims, thus the aim of theoretical grammar is to present a theoretical description of the grammatical system. That is to analyze its grammatical categories & study the mechanisms of grammatical formation of utterances & of words in the process of speech-making. Theoretical grammar is used as the mechanisms according to which the language works, when it is used to communicate.

Theoretical grammar is descriptive. It takes into consideration all language parts, analyzes them, so as to give explanations. Within grammar we discriminate it in morphology & syntax. Morphology deals with the forms of words. Syntax deals with phrases, sentences & texts. Morphology is more abstract than syntax, because it doesn't study connections between words used together in sentences. Different forms are analyzed extracted from their natural environment. Theoretical grammar is scientific in its character. Using certain methods, it investigates speech material. In grammar investigation scholars use a number of methods.

1. Historical comparative
2. Oppositional
3. Distributional
4. Immediate constituency
5. Transformational method
